

poetry

you can look through the key-hole if no one's in sight and see what you can with your limited vision of the forbidden land But only the master has a key four poems

I wore the glasses of a blind man till the eyes of my fingers groped for and touched the face of a word which arrived on the tongue of an evening smell

Richard Sherman

a rubber eraser is efficient for minor mistakes
but only the pointed talon can scratch out the guilty eyes of knowledge

later at night
than the clock can strike darker at night
than the eye can see deeper in the night
than the foot can penetrate the sun of my desires battles the owl

She would have been five in the early spring,
The frost churns yet in the ground,
And started in at the community school.
Her hair was oats glistening in the field,
Like Benny Ray's; he's two.
Every day I cross the shallow stream,
The water puckers over the slippery rocks.
Pausing here,
I ache at this road.

Sylvia Girsh

Out of touch,
Passed's underpull our peril sinks.
Not amulet nor urn, no image at eye-level;
History draws at oblivion perpetually, drinks.

We're on the high seas now:
No candy calm, no tall tale Tricks a snugly-pleated scene; all sets us.
But soundly rounding is the sea: she's under us
As mother palm her infant's boat, Teetering in a bath tide.

We know how hollowly is worked, below,
What once was fat.
We know where we ride.

M.C. Richards